

THE GENERAL STAMPEDE.

The immense and unprecedented majorities for De Plessis and King electors in this city, Baltimore dominated General Scott in Baltimore, nominated him under the belief that he was the strongest candidate in the North, and that Millard Fillmore could not carry even his own State; but they were laboring under a delusion which we deeply regretted at the time, and which we have not ceased to regret, because their action was certain to lead to the deplorable rout now upon us. Against that constantly impending and yet irresistible doom we have struggled with a zeal and energy, indoors and out, on the stump and at the desk, which we Frugality, economy, and a conscientious expenditure of the people's money, which constituted the principal pretensions of Gen. Pierce, however useful they may be, are not very brilliant qualities. The Whigs relied for success on something far more showy—the military renown of their candidates. The result has shown them that the highest passport for success is no passport to the Presidency. Whatever may have been the mistakes committed by Gen. Scott, in the hall of the House of Representatives paper) Nov. 3.

Taking all things into account, we must admit that we have never held an election which passed off so quietly as that of yesterday; and it is the more surprising when we consider that political differences ran so high. Only have the candidates, whose names were before the people, exhibited interest and feeling in the election, but the thousands of outsiders, looking to their future welfare in the success of their party, have exerted themselves to the utmost to gain

Mr. Davis, from my acquaintance and knowledge derived from the private accounts of Webster, I perceived some opportunity of knowing. Not a little which was presented for two or more years, during which time I have been with him, but has been promptly paid a few days before he died, he called the overseer, gave him five hundred dollars to pay over and sent for the minister and paid all that was due; it shall not be said Daniel Webster died in debt; man. These were the words of his private secretary. I began to think those who knew Webster best loved him; and, sir, I was convinced of it more and more.

The total amount contributed to the National Student Relocation Council during the month of October, was by a terrible accident. Mr. B had been spedy at the Falls with some friends, and while the steps of the Falls trestle at the hour for of the evening train, the cars moved on. catch them, and when he had reached the last carriage, he endeavored to mount on the seizing the rails on each side of the steps. He can restreat the carriages with his right hand, the outer rail, and the motion of the cars lust him violently round, with his back to the another second he was hurled beneath the car passing over his head and crushing out his ing the stood on departure ran to t of the form by ught the t missed

y swing
ain. In e wheels ine in a